Lucca

Renowned for its rich history and certainly one of Tuscany's most beloved cities of art, Lucca is unique among city-states in that it managed to maintain its independence until 1847. Its Renaissance-era defensive walls, built between the 16th and 17th centuries, have remained intact and are today the symbol of the city's incredible architectural heritage. Known as the city of a hundred churches because of the large number of places of worship in its territory, Lucca boasts a splendid cathedral with a Romanesque facade, the Cathedral of San Martino, where the sculpture of the Holy Face and the sarcophagus of Ilaria del Carretto are preserved. The Basilica of San Frediano, one of the oldest Catholic places of worship in the city, preserves on its facade, dating back to the 13th-14th centuries, precious mosaics.

The cultural heritage of the city of Lucca is strongly connected to music, considering that the city was the birthplace of numerous composers such as Giacomo Puccini, Alfredo Catalani, and Luigi Boccherini.

Also not to be missed are the city's charming and characteristic squares, such as Piazza Anfiteatro, built in the second half of the first century AD and surrounded by a ring of buildings that follow the elliptical shape of Lucca's ancient Roman Amphitheater.

In addition to Lucca's splendid urban structure, what is striking is the atmosphere in this city, still deeply loved and experienced by the locals who still enliven its small downtown streets.

This tradition finds its main symbol in the famous Spedale, a hostel founded in the 11th century to house pilgrims walking along the Via Francigena.

There are many artistic and architectural works to discover in the town, such as the famous church dedicated to San Jacopo built in 1100 during the period of the Order of the Knights of Tau, a religious and chivalric order. The church was completed with an imposing bell tower in 1280.
