VILLA SOLIGO

A VENETO VILLA IN A
TERRITORY RICH IN HISTORY

Soligo: a village rich in history

Hotel Villa Soligo is situated at Soligo, just a small village, but rich in history, art and traditions, which grew around the feudal castle dating back to 962, when it was granted to Ottone I, Emperor of the Sacred Roman Empire, by the Cenedese bishop Sicardo. It was destroyed by Venice in 1378 to punish the Camino Counts, guilty of defection.
In the eighteenth century Soligo was home to many illustrious celebrities, including Antonio Bellucci (1654-1726), artist and decorator renowned for his skilled rendition of rococò, and Giacomo Cambrucci (1744-1818), a portrait painter popular with the European Courts and aristocracy of the time.

Messegué Centre

In 1982 Alain Camille Mességué, son of Maurice, the 'renovator' of modern herbal medicine, chose villa Brandolini at Soligo to set up a Mességué clinic. The physiotherapy and diet centre was equipped with the most up to date instruments and included a team of plastic surgeons.
Up to 1994 many business people and celebrities from the world of entertainment came to 'restore' themselves in the green surroundings of Soligo. These included: Marcello Mastroianni, Catherine Spaak, Silvio Berlusconi, Maurizio Costanzo, Maria De Filippi, Jerry Calà, Lino Banfi, Alberto Sordi and Ugo Tognazzi.

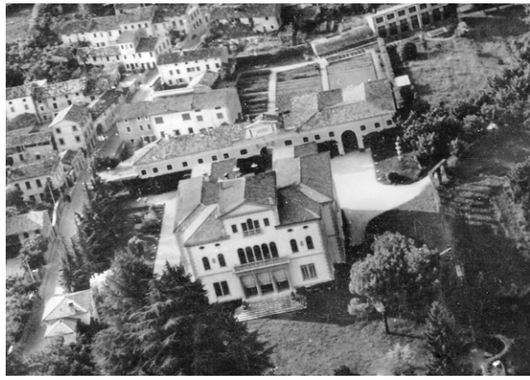

The Azzoni Avogadro family: a manor in 1700

At the end of the eighteenth century the area where hotel Villa Soligo now stands belonged to the Azzoni Avogadro feudal family, who claimed to be related to the Ottonian dynasty. As can be assumed from the 1812 Napoleonic cadastre, the family built a mansion here, which was the reference point for their local properties.

The Brandolini family: a pavilion villa

In the nineteenth century the mansion was sold to the Brandolini Counts, a noble family originally from Forlì. Brandolino IV, one of the most famous soldiers of fortune of the time, fought for the Veneto Republic. As a reward for his victories, in 1436 the Serenissima offered him the county of Cison, where the Brandolini family retained uncontested political control until 1805.
Some decades later, Elisabetta Gambara, Brandolino VIII's widow, purchased the Soligo property from the Azzoni Avogadro Counts, and chose to live there.
Her son Vincenzo II inherited the mansion and demolished the old building to construct a luxurious pavilion villa in the current more open and sunnier position.

the villa today

VILLA SOLIGO

TIMELESS BEAUTY

Today's villa was rebuilt by Count Carlo Brandolini d'Adda in 1913 and in 1944 was damaged by retaliations of Nazi-Fascist forces.
The centre section of the main façade features an architraved portico accessed by a broad flight of steps; the tetrastyle body ends with an entablature topped by a terrace onto which opens the first floor arched mullioned window. The side sections feature pairs of windows with stone sills and cornices: enhanced by coupled columns and architraves on the ground floor and mullioned on the first floor, with heraldic shields between them.
The wide gabled elevation, delimited by pseudo-ashlar corner posts, houses a narrow mullioned window flanked by rectangular apertures with slightly protruding stone balconies.
The façade is contained in pseudo-ashlar corner posts, and divided visually by a horizontal band course marking the first floor; the roof overhang is supported by large moulded stone corbels. An extremely evocative, refined environment, the Villa is the ideal location for an unforgettable holiday surrounded by style and finesse. The building stands in 15,000 square metres of centuries-old grounds, perfect for ceremonies and special occasions.
